

Competition is always good. Cellular phones wouldn't have predominated the market if it wasn't. There is no way possible the XM can broadcast local weather, traffic, and the like for the entire United States. It would only be feasible to hit the larger cities. I don't see what the fuss is all about. Sure some broadcasters should worry. It's competition. This competition will not affect the market significantly. That currently can be taken as a fact by comparrison with television. Cable and satellite TV today has not shut down public television broadcasting. ABC, NBC, CBS, and FOX have all taken advantage of both medias and this is already happening to local radio. Thank you for your support and hard work. I appreciate you many regulations that make society a better place to work.

Sincerely,
Henry Davis
